In observance of World Data Privacy Day (January 28th), the Department of Computer Science organized a guest lecture which aimed to educate participants on the crucial importance of cyber security in their daily lives. The session focused on raising awareness about data privacy, online threats, and safe internet practices to empower individuals to protect their personal information from cybercriminals.

Our guest speaker emphasized the significance of data privacy in today's digital landscape, highlighting the risks associated with careless online behavior. The lecture was engaging and interactive, fostering a dynamic exchange of ideas between the speaker and participants. The audience actively participated by asking thought-provoking questions and sharing personal anecdotes about their encounters with cyber threats.

To further illustrate key concepts, the speaker conducted a live demonstration, simulating phishing techniques and showcasing safe browsing practices. This hands-on approach helped the audience grasp the potential risks and security measures, leaving them better equipped to navigate the online landscape.
